The good news is many Berkeley residents are living longer, healthier lives. But despite these gains, we continue to see alarming disparities in many health outcomes based on income, race/ethnicity, neighborhood, education, and other social determinants of health. We need to re-double our efforts to eliminate these social inequities and other risk factors that contribute to poor health among some Berkeley residents. This work cannot be done by the Public Health Division alone – it will take a community-wide effort and partnerships among many City agencies and community-based organizations. It will take more than access to health care – we need to look at the many ways in which our social, economic, and physical environments shape our lives, and work together to create healthy environments for everyone in Berkeley.
